Today’s poem, by Leslie Moore of Brooksville, is set in Smith Cove. Leslie writes that her poem tells a “fishing story that’s true.”

After the Splash
by Leslie Moore

We step to the porch railing—wine glasses in hand, Scrabble forgotten—to spy a bird floundering in the cove, dashing the sea with great, feathered downbeats, almost obscured by the spray.
It’s a bald eagle and my heart thrashes with it.

I’m ready to canoe to the rescue, my husband paddling, me leaning over the bow, poised to pluck a frantic, flapping, full-grown eagle out of the sea in my bare arms. Its wing span is wider than I am tall, its beak a scimitar.

But the bald eagle doesn’t need me.
It settles onto the water, plump as a duck, turns beak to shore, scoops the sea with feathery palms, and climbs out on a rocky shelf, dragging in one talon a fish, huge and silvery in the sunlight.
